Week 1 – Venting

Do you ever read the “Ventline” in the Gazette?
I don’t read it often. There’s just not enough time.
But last Saturday while waiting in the barbershop (now there’s a rare event!), I found myself with a lot of time and a newspaper in my hands.
As I scanned down through the usual assortment of “Ventline” rants about Democrats and Republicans and garbage pickup, I found a couple of real gems.
The first one said, “That new Little Caesars commercial is the most annoying thing since I had a cat that couldn’t hit the litter box.” I found myself chuckling even though I haven’t seen the commercial.
But the second one really got me: “To the man that sold me the F-150 in the Wal-Mart parking lot: Stop calling yourself a Christian. You’re giving Christ a bad name.”
I couldn’t keep from laughing out loud. This person was really ticked off!
Now in West Virginia it would be wrong to assume that the person who bought a pickup truck in a Wal-Mart parking lot was either a man or a woman.
But it was obvious that this person had a need to “vent.”
I have friends who regularly submit their vents to the Gazette, and on those rare occasions when I do scan through the column I can usually identify some of them.
For some, venting is a lot like therapy. It’s a way to get something off your chest, to blow off some steam,

Committee Formed To Discuss
Nuclear Development
Legislation Will Not Be Considered At This Time

Charleston, WV – At least one state senator is treating legislation that would lift West Virginia’s restrictions on nuclear power development as if it were radioactive.

“My wife would kill me if I voted for this bill,” Sen. Frank Deem, R-Wood, said during a meeting of the Senate Energy, Industry and Mining Committee on Wednesday. “I’m opposed to promoting nuclear energy in West Virginia.”

Instead of considering the legislation, the committee decided to form a study subcommittee, with Sen. Evan Jenkins, D-Cabell, as the chairman (Note:
Other members of the subcommittee are Sen. Joe Minard, D-Harrison, Sen. Bob Williams, D-

“I’m just not sure we have, in this committee, the time and energy to really consider the best way to handle this,” Jenkins told the full committee. “I’m not ready to candidly say, ‘I give my blessing.’”

“I am interested in having a broader discussion about the generation of nuclear power,” Jenkins said after the meeting. “How does this impact the health and safety of our citizens? How does this impact the coal industry?
Are there appropriate safeguards in place for how waste is disposed of?”

Sen. Brooks McCabe, D-Kanawha, is sponsoring the bill. It would repeal part of the code that bans nuclear and to work through your anger. For others, columns like the “Ventline” are merely an opportunity to use the free press to get a message out.

Don Alexander

There’s a lot of venting going on these days, particularly within our own environmental community.

I have watched for years now as the frustration of friends and allies in the coalfields just keeps growing. These are the folks who are forced to live the indignities of the scourge of mountaintop removal mining day in and day out. These are the folks who time after time have found their small victories and glimmers of hope turned to dust.

So just try to imagine how these folks must have felt last Friday when the super-conservative 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals – packed with Reagan and Bush appointees – overturned the ruling by U.S. District Judge Robert C. Chambers that would have required more thorough permit reviews of mountaintop removal coal-mining operations.

Seems to me like an awfully good time to vent. And just yesterday at the West Virginia Coal Association’s annual mining symposium some doofus with the “American Coalition for Clean Coal” reportedly claimed that Americans are beginning to believe the industry’s assertion that coal can be burned cleanly and provide for the nation’s energy future.

This same doofus credited the pro-coal group’s $40 million propaganda campaign for increasing support for coal-fired electricity generation.

Well, duh!!

Seems to me like an awfully good time to vent. There’s more snow and cold in the forecast, so don’t forget to keep your bird feeders full this week.

Committee Formed To Discuss Nuclear Development

power plant construction until a national facility is available that can safely and effectively dispose of radioactive wastes.

Deem expressed concern that the nuclear energy road may not be suitable for a state that depends so heavily on jobs in the coal, oil and natural gas industries.

Deem has many decades of experience in the oil and gas business in northwestern West Virginia.

But McCabe said the legislation would level the playing field as West Virginia promotes itself as an energy state.

“I view it as a significant inconsistency that we are banning nuclear power and at the same time we are going to our neighbors around the country and saying ‘Let’s consider coal, we can make clean coal technologies,’” McCabe said.

“If we’re going to be an energy state, we ought to embrace or at least consider all forms of reasonable energy production, of which nuclear power is clearly one.”

Meanwhile, a representative of Appalachian Power views the bill favorably.

“It would make sense to us not to have any barriers like that in place,” said Appalachian Power spokeswoman Jeri Matheney. “So for that reason we would support the bill.”

Appalachian Power’s parent company, American Electric Power, has a nuclear power plant in Bridgman, Mich.

“We don’t have any plans for nuclear in West Virginia, so I wouldn’t want to make people think we did,” Matheney said.

If nuclear power would ever come to West Virginia, it would be decades away, McCabe said.

“The nuclear power is not going to be here tomorrow or next year or five years from now or 10 years from now,” he said. “But if you have a 25 to 50 year time horizon for West Virginia as an energy state, nuclear power may be a very viable alternative ... as a supplement to coal, not as a replacement.

“I want everyone to say, ‘Let’s not be afraid of our shadow. Let’s at least be able to discuss this,’” McCabe said.

Think Renewable Energy

Solar Energy Tax Credit Bill

Delegate Bill Wooton (D-Raleigh) this week introduced HB 2535, a bill that would provide a state personal income tax credit of up to $2,000 for the installation of a residential solar energy system.

The bill also would require a “net metering” credit for any excess electricity generated.

Way to go, Bill! And welcome back.
PSC Drops Plan For Power Line Oversight Hearing

By Ken Ward Jr.
Charleston Gazette Staff Writer

Charleston, WV – State regulators have dropped plans to hold a comprehensive oversight hearing before giving final approval for Allegheny Power to start building a $1.1 billion power line across northern West Virginia.

The state Public Service Commission granted Allegheny’s request to eliminate the compliance hearing, which was required by the PSC’s August ruling approving plans for the Trans-Allegheny Interstate Line, or TrAIL.

Allegheny lawyers objected that the compliance hearing would have required the company to obtain all necessary environmental permits and other regulatory approvals before it could start construction of any of the 120-mile project.

Under the new PSC ruling, Allegheny can use “phased construction” that breaks the transmission line into smaller segments that obtain separate approvals from various state and federal agencies.

In a 23-page order issued Friday evening, commissioners said the PSC could still hear concerns about whether the project had met various other permit requirements — listed as conditions of the overall PSC approval — through its normal review process . . .

In its Friday ruling, the commission also turned down requests from the Sierra Club and several citizens to reconsider its overall approval of the TrAIL project.

The PSC approval can now be appealed to the state Supreme Court.

TrAIL is one of two major power line projects proposed in West Virginia, and would cross eight counties from north of Morgantown to northern Virginia. The other is American Electric Power’s Potomac Appalachian Transmission Highline, or PATH, which would run from the John Amos Power Plant near St. Albans to Martinsburg.

Manchin Urges Coal Industry To Support Renewable Energy

By The Associated Press

Charleston, WV – Coal producers need to help West Virginia increase renewable energy production to show its commitment to new energy policies, Gov. Joe Manchin said Thursday.

During a speech to the West Virginia Coal Association annual mining symposium, Manchin urged the industry to support his legislation calling for renewable energy sources to generate 10 percent of the state’s energy needs by 2015 and 25 percent by 2025.

Coal accounts for about 98 percent electrical production in West Virginia, the nation’s No. 2 coal producer behind Wyoming.

By getting behind the proposed standards, the mining industry stands to gain the credibility it needs to influence the national debate on energy policy issues such as global warming, Manchin said.

If West Virginia doesn’t become a leader in renewable energy, “no one’s going to believe us,” he said.

The Democratic governor called his plan realistic because it includes turning coal into liquids for fuel and chemicals, not just wind, solar, hydroelectric and biomass energy. “We can bring balance to the energy portfolio,” he said.

Renewable projects such as wind farms and solar panels can also be placed on reclaimed surface mine sites, he said.

(Note: We heard from sources at the Capitol that Manchin’s speech was not well received by the Coal Association folks, and we are still trying to determine how much of the Governor’s proposed “Alternative and Renewable Portfolio Standard” will actually come from renewable sources. The article above is an excerpt from a February 19 article in the Charleston Gazette, and is reprinted here with their permission).

‘Bottle bill’ Uncorked Again
In WV Legislature
By Alison Knezevich, Charleston Gazette
Staff writer

For years, “bottle bills” have been floating around the Capitol as a way to reduce litter and encourage recycling. Now, legislators are again looking at the issue.

At a joint meeting Thursday of the House Judiciary and Finance committees, delegates heard a prohibition presentation by John Ferrari, president of California operations for the recycling company NexCycle.

Under a proposal sponsored by Delegate Barbara Fleischauer, D-Monongalia, consumers would pay a 10-cent fully refundable deposit on beverage containers like bottles and cans. Milk containers would be exempt. People would get their deposit back when they took them to a redemption site to be recycled. The state would receive the cash from unclaimed deposits.

Beverage containers make up 40 percent to 60 percent of litter, Ferrari told lawmakers. The 11 states that have bottle bills have greatly cut down on their litter, he said.

Such laws also get people into the recycling mindset, he said: “It’s a behavior change.”

Supporters also say the bill would spur growth in the recycling industry, because workers will be needed to run redemption centers and haul recyclables.

“This is a job-creating bill,” said Gary Zuckett, director of the West Virginia Citizen Action Group, which has long pushed for the law.

A coalition of groups against the plan - including the state’s beverage, beer wholesalers, and retailers associations - is circulating a memo calling the bill “a massive tax increase and job killer.”

They say it will send shoppers to border states that do not have bottle bills, cutting into retail sales and tax revenue in West Virginia. They also say it could lead to fraud, with residents of other states coming in to collect refunds for deposits they never paid.

Greg Sayre of the Association of Independent & Professional Recyclers, which is part of that coalition, said the program would be too costly for the state.

He also said paper makes up far more of the waste stream than drink containers, and that rural residents would be inconvenienced because they’d have farther to drive to redemption sites.

Delegate Kelli Sobonya, R-Cabell, said she’s still studying the bill. While she supports recycling, she said she’s worried about how it could impact businesses such as hotels, restaurants and bars.

“I’m just concerned about the cost,” she said.

Transmission Line Training & Strategy Meeting
Thursday, March 19, 2009
8:30 am - 6:00 pm
Cacapon Resort State Park
Berkeley Springs, West Virginia

The Sierra Club is sponsoring a one-day meeting to educate activists, attorneys, public officials, and others on transmission line issues in the east. The goal of the meeting is to bring together individuals and organizations concerned about new transmission lines that are intended to expand coal-fired power generation, with an eye towards the upcoming Potomac-Appalachian Transmission Highline (PATH) in particular.

Topics include, among others: the PJM planning process, how to support transmission for renewables without supporting coal, alternatives to new transmission, the legal framework for transmission line siting, and lessons from the TrAILCo line. In mid-afternoon, those who are interested will break into litigation and organizing strategy groups, which will focus on concrete next steps to push for greener and more economical alternatives to coal-by-wire.

RSVP to Violet Lehrer at: violet.lehrer@sierraclub.com or 415-977-5766 at your earliest convenience and no later than March 6. Please indicate in your reply whether you plan to attend one of the strategy sessions (litigation or organizing/lobbying). Please see www.cacaponresort.com for lodging and travel information, or call 1-800-CALL-WVA or 304-258-1022 to make a reservation. Lodging is also available in nearby Berkeley Springs.

"Clean Coal" ..... is an oxymoron
Clean Elections BillIntroduced

The WV Public Campaign Financing Act has been introduced in the Senate - SB241.

The Campaign for Clean Elections expects it to be introduced in the House in the next day or so. Delegate Dan Poling is a new sponsor, along with sponsors from last year - Delegates Doyle (lead), Marshall, Hatfield, Brown, Moore, Perdue, Fleischauer, Klemka, Ellem, and Lane.

Carol Warren and Julie Archer are lobbying this bill, and we'll be hearing from them throughout the session as this legislation progresses.

McKetchnie Touts Renewable Energy to Legislature

By John Christensen, WVEC Lobbyist

Michael McKetchnie, owner of Mountain View Solar of Berkeley Springs and last year’s winner of WVEC’s “Green Entrepreneur of the Year” award, made the 300 mile trek down to Charleston this Thursday to talk to the Legislature about renewable energy opportunities in West Virginia.

In the morning Mike was an integral part of a discussion in the Senate Economic Development Committee about SCR 4, the “Gray Energy” study resolution.

In the afternoon he was part of a panel discussion sponsored by “Industries of the Future-WV”. All in all, it made for a jam-packed day at the Capitol for Mike.

Michael was invited to participate by Dr. Carl Irwin, a mathematics professor at WVU and co-founder of Industries of the Future-WV, to present his experience as an expert in renewable energy residential construction.

Dr. Irwin introduced McKetchnie as a small business owner involved in residential energy audits. Mike made quite an impression on the senate committee with his green jobs presentation. Members were interested and asked numerous questions about renewable energy and its opportunities in the Mountain State, and how it could save homeowners thousands of dollars in heating and cooling costs just through ordinary, sensible construction procedures.

Mike said we need to build green houses for new construction and renovate existing houses that may not meet today’s standards and touted the “weatherization program” currently underway in WV as a step in the right direction.

Dr. Irwin related how a WVU energy audit saved an eastern panhandle company, Quad Graphics, over a half million dollars in recapturing heat energy lost in its production process.

Sen. Mike Hall (D-Putnam) turned the committee discussion to the issue of “net metering.” The senator said he was in favor of democratizing the power industry by allowing homeowners, businesses and groups the ability to sell power back to the grid in WV. Committee chair Sen. Richard Browning (D-Wyoming) promised to work hard to pass SCR 4 and to invite Michael back for future discussions.

“Judicial Hellhole”??

A Texas law professor told members of the Senate Judiciary Committee legislators Wednesday that West Virginia doesn’t deserve its reputation as “judicial hellhole.”

We agree.

The “judicial hellhole” is obviously located in Richmond, Virginia, where the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals decided Friday to overturn a court ruling by U.S. District Judge Robert C. Chambers that would have required more thorough permit reviews of mountaintop removal coal-mining operations.
